REVIEWS

"Latvian filmmaker Signe Baumane quietly delivered one of the best female resistance films of the year — and it's animated. It's a wonderful surprise in a movie already filled to the brim with them. It's a sprawling story that follows the life of Zelma (voiced by Dagmara Domińczyk), a girl who is destined to walk down the much-tread path of her ancestors to be married to a man and taken care of. But the more she grows up and experiences new things, including bullies at school and terrible boyfriends, the more she realizes that what's destined for her may not be for her. Her body even resists the thought of such conformity. My Love Affair With Marriage is an exuberant and complex movie about the journey to female rebellion." - Candice Frederick, HuffPost

"Funny, moving, and visually stunning throughout, it's easily one of the most distinct animated films I've seen in quite awhile and it serves as a needed reminder that animation is an art form that can be used for more than family-oriented narratives." - Peter Sobczynski, RogerEbert.com

"A joyfully exuberant piece of work that manages to conduct some serious examination of human behavior whilst always being nothing less than gloriously entertaining. Many of its themes of gender, identity and conformity also seem incredibly timely." - Laurence Boyce, Cineuropa

"This film is something special. It's unafraid to reveal our innermost thoughts, fears, hopes, regrets, mistakes, and dreams. It celebrates unfiltered authenticity with clever writing and delightful visuals. It's an outstanding feminist film that will undoubtedly win over audiences everywhere." - Liz Whitemore, Reel News Daily

"One of the best movies of the year. Signe Baumane's film is absolutely brimming with life, wonder, exploration, grief, trauma, longing, love, and so much more to the point where you could easily argue that this is the most expressive film in years." - Caillou Pettis, Caillou Pettis Movie Reviews

"For those who have more contained ideas about animated films, My Love Affair with Marriage will doubtless make them think twice about the medium's endless possibilities. This is a deeply funny, socially conscious sharp satire with heart." - Josh Batchelder, Josh At The Movies

"Right from the start, Signe Baumane's animation proves it has earned a place in the hallowed halls of raw storytelling. Rough, storybook-sketched 2D characters are layered on top of highly texturized stop-motion backgrounds, detailing every paint stroke, scrape, sometimes even mold spore. And the imagery is just the start." - Victoria Davis, Animation World Network

DIRECTOR'S Q & A WITH SIGNE BAUMANE:

Describe the film for us in your own words.

At the center of the story, in the eye of the storm, is a young, spirited woman, Zelma, who is determined to find perfect love and lasting marriage no matter what. But she is not aware of what exactly makes her want love and marriage in the first place. And she is even less aware that her own biology is a powerful force to reckon with.

I am exploring what's behind the most mythologized human emotion — romantic love — and counterbalancing it with biology. The animation allowed me to express complicated concepts and ideas in images. It also allowed me to incorporate humor in moments that otherwise would make you cry.

What drew you to this story?

After I finished my first animated feature film, Rocks in My Pockets, I knew I wanted to make a film about my second marriage. I had been married to a gender-bending Swedish man and our love story was very dramatic. It unfolded against the backdrop of historic events when the Soviet Union collapsed, and the newly independent Latvia entered an entirely new system of values.

I thought it could make a good film. East meets West and both are clueless about what the other is about. But once I sat down to write, my inner Sherlock Holmes woke up and asked, “Why did you want to marry him? Why did he want to marry you?” So, I had to dig a bit deeper to find where the impulse to marry was coming from. Which led me to the question, “Why is the concept of marriage in our society, East or West, so entangled with concepts of love and gender?”

And I somehow started to understand that the concept of love is based on cultural forces and also biological needs. Cultural influences are easy to represent via songs, and conversations with your friends and family. But then, there's the biology aspect of it, which is ultimate objectivity, which you cannot ignore. So, I wanted to peel off a little bit of the mystery of this very overhyped human emotion —love.

When did you start to work on the film?

I started writing it in 2015 when we thought it would be possible to have a woman president soon. The elections that followed – and the #MeToo movement – indicated that there are strains between emerging new attitudes towards women, along with broader questions of gender, and the more conservative parts of our society which are trying to hold these old concepts together.

I was confronted with an unsettling question: Where did Zelma, this passionate young woman, get the idea that she must love someone and marry them in order to feel happy and fulfilled? Although marriage is a social institution, it comes from a deep-seated human need for intimacy and control. Human neural pathways of oxytocin and other neurotransmitters help to establish intimate bonds, but there are almost endless variations of these bonds.

Knowing neuroscience only on the level of popular psychology meant that after many months of research, I had numerous sessions with Pascal Wallisch, Clinical Assistant Professor of Psychology at New York University, who gave me valuable guidance and advice. Because of these challenging “Biology” segments, it took me a year to write 24 drafts of the script. Another challenge was to write 24 songs with composer Kristian Sensini for the Mythology Sirens.

Zelma and The Mythology Sirens

These “Sirens” are an equivalent of a Greek chorus, repeating stereotypical views of what a marriage should be.

The singing trio lays down rules for Zelma of why she must marry and how to properly care for her husband, which are often in direct conflict with her own biology. As a child, Zelma thinks she is equal to boys. But to get the attention of a boy she likes, she must change into a weaker, more submissive version of herself. Her mother insists that Zelma’s most important asset is her virginity, that a woman’s value is only measured by having a husband and children. Her college friend, Darya, gets pregnant and loses her life. Horrified, Zelma realizes that the only way to get ahead is to stick to a man. She marries Sergei, but he repeatedly abuses her. Their marriage is not between equals because they understood that society places men above women.

What do you hope audiences will take away from the film - specifically young women? And how about men in the audience, what do you hope they'll walk away with?

I would like young women to feel empowered after seeing the film. You know how they always tell you to connect with your own power, but they never tell you what it is exactly? I hope the film will shed some light on it. Yes, it is loving yourself, but it's also connecting with other people in a meaningful way. You cannot exercise your power if you are not treated as an equal, legally and politically. Sometimes it may feel that we are not entirely in control of our emotions, that feelings of love, anger, or fear carry us like helpless ducklings. But we are not helpless ducklings, we have powerful brains and can better deal with emotions than helpless ducklings.

Since the film explores a woman's interior world, I hope it would be interesting for men in the audience to see how busy our minds are. What do we think of when we kiss? Why do we return to toxic relationships? I would like for people to recognize themselves in the film and say, "Ah! I see now why I stuck with that person for so long even though it was a toxic relationship."

What fascinates me about humans is how eagerly we want to dismiss science when it threatens to expose the fairy tales that we tell ourselves. We are all biological creatures, yet we hold on to ideas about ourselves that are not rooted in this reality. Especially in matters of love, we are willfully ignorant.

Zelma, 15, Man on Train

Why animation for this story?

Animation is a perfect medium to tell complicated, layered stories for adult audiences. It irks me that general audiences see animation only as a medium for children. At film festivals the majority of animated shorts are tackling adult issues with diverse techniques and daring visual approaches. But animated feature films, especially produced by major studios, all have a similar look and approach. I understand it comes from financial considerations, you are not going to experiment with a film that has a multimillion-dollar budget, but still, it would be great to see more variety in bigger productions.

Animation is the most flexible storytelling medium there is. My Love Affair With Marriage follows a person's life from ages 7 to 29. We are able to see inside her mind, follow her imagination, get insights from her Biology, and sing along with the Mythology Sirens, all seamlessly incorporated into one story. Only in animation is that possible!

You combine multiple techniques in the film. What was your artistic approach?

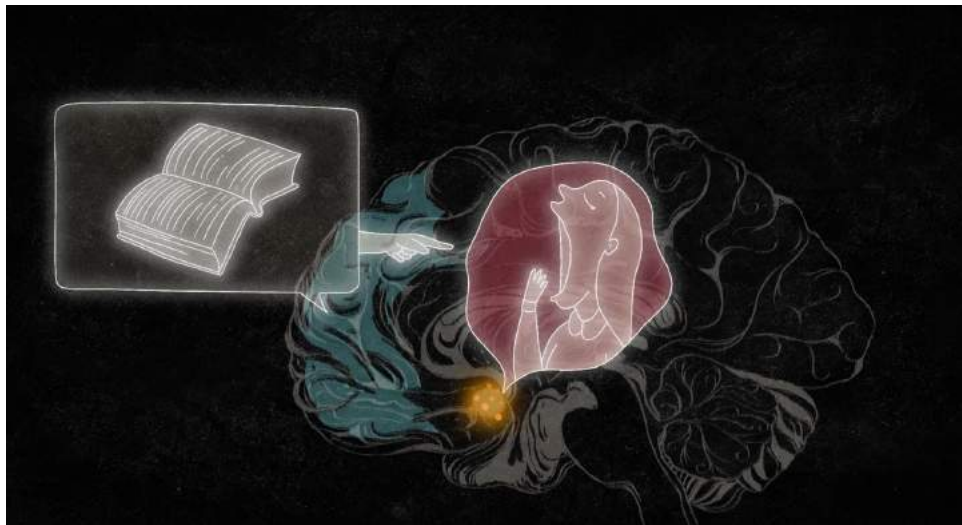

There are four general environments in the film, each represented by a different aesthetic. Zelma's real life unfolds in an environment of hand-made sets and papier-mâché sculptures. The characters are hand-drawn with shadows sketched-in to compliment the look of the photographed backgrounds, pointing to the struggle between imperfect, human-made structures versus nature.

Her imagination is depicted by 2-D drawings with flat, colorful backgrounds. She uses her imagination to process the world around her.

Nina, Sergei's mother

Zelma's biology is the world of the brain, neurons, neurotransmitters, or electric impulses that determine her actions and emotions. Biology is a neuron-like, talking character that reveals all the activities taking place. This world is ancient, mysterious, and moody, a thunderstorm in the middle of the night. I realized that although this segment needed a different style from my own, it had to be unique and personal. After an extensive search I came across an award-winning film by Yajun Shi called Parasite. Her style fits My Love Affair With Marriage perfectly. Yajun was a joy to work with.

Biology segment

Finally, Zelma's political world is represented by very simple maps. They start out with just two colors and as Zelma learns more about the world, each country she travels to gains color separating them from others. The idea behind this approach is that life unfolds on several levels: personal, biological, political, and imaginary.

What was the biggest challenge in making the film?

Sustaining the creative flow for seven years while fundraising. Creative and financial challenges are tightly intertwined, as a tight budget can ground unrestrained creativity. But a tight budget can also inspire creativity: How can you make the story the best you can for the small amount of money you have? This was the most ambitious project I have ever undertaken, with 30 singing and speaking characters and about 200 non-speaking characters. I think I was delusional when I started a project of this scale. Thankfully, we had great partners and collaborators.

Polish-born Dagmara Domińczyk, recently seen in Succession and The Lost Daughter, is narrating the film as Zelma. Why did you choose her?

For the main character Zelma, I was reluctant to commit to anybody. I felt the role was very demanding. What actor would have an Eastern European sensibility, would be able to do so many ages, would be able to convey an independent spirit but also vulnerability and have a wicked sense of humor? It was impossible to find such an actor! Then Sturgis asked me to look at a video on YouTube of Dagmara Dominczyk reading a chapter from her book The Lullaby of Polish Girls at a public library. Instantly I was transported into her world, and I knew she was the actor we were looking for.

There are plenty of layers of feminist interpretations of the film, but it is not an example of an agitating, feminist cinema.

Yes, I hope I haven't made a propaganda film. I have a strong allergy to propaganda, simplifying characters, to just illustrating an idea... The only ideology I feel in this film is humanism. We're all confused. And we all want the same things: we want to love – we want to be loved. We want to be accepted the way we are. And this is the message: searching for yourself and your place in society; trying to find love and not being able to find one because of certain rules set by society. And another theme that is important to me: inequality between genders which breaks the intimacy – when one gender is made to believe they're better than the other.

For me, to tell a story means to be alive. I make films to connect with other people.
